sides glutted the little streams, and it was this high water that the new settlers wanted to conserve until the fall when the creek level dropped once more. It was later found that not only the high water, but also the entire creek water before the irrigation period began and after

[6]The Journal of James Lindsay, MSS, (Daughters of Utah Pioneers Historical Collection, Heber City, 1920), p. 8.

Trial Lake